Maxwell Tells of a Thirst-Quenching Water did flow theret two years ago, and many houses of the integration of the city were runled and thousands of bollars worth of property. Corresponded of the Integration of Integra

I drank from the well. The water was pnot good. It tasted like medicine—or as I suppose medicine tastes, but in truth I never tasted any medicine. The sultiplur was very offensive to me, but I drank as much as I could stand, and proceeded on my journey.

I do not know whether it was due to the water, or not, but I rode all that afternoon over the plain, and never wanted a drink of water. The thirst which was so excessive in the morning had left me. It was just as the people told me it would be—I would not care for another drink of water that day. I was told that the water loses its peculiar color in a short time when it is exposed for or in a short time when it is exposed was told that the water loses its peculiar color in a short time when it is exposed it to the air. It is surely one of the most peculiar springs of water I have ever heard of, yet it seems to be little known. I had never heard of it until I entered the town that day.

It was not there a few years ago, as I have occasion for remembering. It was litrough this region of country—this is eight miles from I ake Tulare—that I apassed in the year 1883, and found it the most deadly desert on the face of the earth. Little did I think then that in five years I would return to find orchards and vineyards where then was nothing but an expanse of simmering I sand, drifted like snow. I would have appreciated this water then, even if it does not taste well. I remember distinctly how welcome it would have been, for I had been riding all day without water, and at dusk came to a pool deep in a hollow place of the plain. It was warm and reeking with decaying I weetstien and dead news and lizards: t was warm and reeking with decaying vegetation and dead newts and lizzards; yet I drank from it, and lay down to sleep. At midnight I arose and proceeded, having filled my canteen from the pool. At daybreak I found a dog out in the desert dying for water. I gave him what water I had, pouring it into my shoe for him to drink; and then I rode on flity-six miles without water. This was five years ago. Now, where I thought to find deserts still, the land is cultivated. Fields of wheat and corn and potatoes have usurped the domain of the sagebrush and the desert weeds. Orchards of peaches, apples, plums and and all manner of fruits have taken the place of the drifts of sand in which my etation and dead newts and lizzards

A LAKE LAID OFF IN FARMS.

I am told that the Government has surveyed Lake Tulare and laid it off into farms and sections and roads, in anticipation of the early day when it shall become dry land. But I, for one, would want no home in the bottom of that old lake bed. All would be well enough during ordinary times, and in the summer when there is no rain. But there might be a change. The canals which lead the water from the rivers are quite sufficient to keep the channels dry during ordinary years. But these channels are still here, and what would come to pass if a great flood, like that of 1852, should visit California? The mountains would send down their torrents, and the dams and dikes would be swept from the channels of the rivers, and the deluge would be poured into the dry bed of the lake, and then where would the farms and the vineyards be! This is no speculation, but is exactly what will some day come to pass. The lake will surely dry up; but it will as surely be filled with water again when the rainy winters come.

A calamity similar to such a one, but on a smaller scale, was recently seen at continuous and signature of J. I. Sexuante of J. M. Sexuante of the scale and signature of J. I. Sexuante of J. L. Sexuante of A LAKE LAID OFF IN VARMS.

Fresno. That town of ten thousand souls is built partly in the channel of an old river, which had been dry ever since California had been known to white men, and no one ever dreamed that water would again flow there. But twater did flow there two years ago, and many houseas of the city were ruined and thousands of dollars worth of property destroyed. The city has voted fifty thousand dollars to build embankments going to his night work when the to prevent a recurrence of the calamity.

Barrels of hardcider were placed in front of the cabins, and the "Log Cabin hard cider campaign of '40" has passed into history as the most enthusiastic of our political contests. Log cabins have for this reason a permanent place in American history.
